Wesley's commitment and passion for building better resources for schools stems from his own family dynamic. His wife is a school teacher, and Wesley is determined to craft a better future not only for Queenslanders but for his own children.

For Wesley, a successful project is a truly collaborative one. Ensuring everyone has a stake in the outcome means a much more robust, well-rounded process - and a better finished result, too.

"A collaborative and impact-driven journey will always result in a successful project, despite the nature or size," he says. "For me it's not measured by the end product, it's about the journey of delivering the final product that determines the outcome or success of the project."

Wesley's deep fascination with how the various elements of a project meld together - from the stakeholders to the construction process - means he has a strong understanding of interpersonal relationships. It's what he finds the most rewarding about each project.

Extensive experience as a project manager for contractors has given Wesley a unique insight into the importance of clear communication and building trust early on in the relationship.

"What makes Honeywill a leader in the field is how collaborative and transparent we are," he says.

A humble upbringing also instilled a sense of altruism in Wesley, which he carries through in his work within the education sector. "We create the spaces in which the youth of tomorrow are being educated. We can tangibly see the difference we make from project to project, and that's the most humbling and rewarding experience," he says.

Wesley's determination to reach the best outcome for the client shows a tenacity that reflects Honeywill's commitment to excellence. There's no such thing as giving up, according to Wesley. "It's through difficult situations where we often find our best selves," he says.

A daily philosophy Wesley strives to live by is to "leave the space in which I have worked in a better state than we found it."

"We create the spaces in which the youth of tomorrow are being educated. We can tangibly see the difference we make from project to project, and that's the most humbling and rewarding experience."
